Archeology Work Stations

You will be playing the role of an archeologist. You are looking at artifacts that have been found at different archeological digs. Your job as the archeologist is to categorize the items into the areas that they come from.

There are six stations and at each station you will be answering these questions.
Your answers can be put into your journal.

What people did the artifacts come from?
Where might this tribe come from?
What type of dwelling would they have stayed in?
What type of food would they have eaten?
What would the social structure of the people be?
Is there any evidence of economic activity and trade?
What type of transportation might the people have used or continue to use today?
What other information do the items tell you about the people that they come from, write those things down, make a drawing, create a hypothesis.

Stations may have only one item or more than one. You will make a hypothesis as to what each item is and what it might be used for. (Books and Internet are resources that will help you find what each item may be used for.)

You will be answering these questions for each station.

Make a drawing of at least one of the artifacts from each station

On the map provided you would be placing the location of regions and the name of a tribe in appropriate region.

Books will be provided as a resource. The Internet will be provided as a resource and the library will be used as a resource.
